Although of moderate size the effects are very impressive; when two copper conductors are brought in contact and afterwards separated to some distance, a hissing arched flame passes between them, and when charcoal is substituted, the flame and light becomes insupportably brilliant, bringing tears from the eyes of those who attempt, while too near, to look at it. Leaves of gold and other metal are burnt as if by an explosion; water is decomposed by it as if it were boiling. The shock, in one modification, is unsupportably painful, but by drawing a stop the shock ceases. Dr. Williams has satisfactorily accounted for this anamoly. He says that the bogs contain very few vegetables that have a tendency to run rapidly into decomposition. They principally consist of mosses, interspersed with a small portion of heath, fern, and a few grasses. The decomposition of the bog moss is so very slow that it can scarcely be said to rot in water; and it possesses vitality so great, that when dried and apparently dead, it may be revived on again placing in the water. Neither do its leaves full off, so as to afford any quantity of dead.
